The period that each crew spent at sea has been rounded to the nearest day, so in some cases crews that landed on the same day will have spent a different number of days at sea and crews that landed on different days will have spent the same number of days at sea, depending on precisely when on that day they landed. Where crews have made a stopover en route to their final destination, the ‘days at sea’ do not include any days that they spent on land during the stopover. In many cases this means a difference of months between the departure and final arrival date and the number of days at sea. In the case of Erden Eruc’s Pacific row in the boat Around-n-Over, the result is that the period between the start and the finish of the crossing is eighteen months longer than the number of days that he spent at sea.
